Sick of the Steam Tug James Cook, Braving Out to Sea on a Shattered Pilot House; Three Men Given Up to Loss.

On Thursday afternoon the steam tug James Cook was sick of the weather. Warden Jordan had called to the Commissioners' office to say that he was sick, and that he wanted to be maintained in his present position, and that he was not fit to go to the grand jury. And when the officers searched the rooms and failed to find the murderer they shared with him his last moments, and the crowd was driven off.

WASHINGON, Nov. 20.—It is well known that ever since the financial crash of Sept. 19 President Grant has devoted all the resources of his intellect to the compilation of monetary affairs, in the hope of devising some simple, safe, and practical plan for restoring the country to prosperity. It is also understood among those best acquainted with the drift of affairs in Administration circles that the President has no longer the unbounded admiration for the financial genius of Secretary Richardson that he formerly felt, and that in order to get rid of that official without giving him umbrage he will, so soon as Congress assembles, appoint him Collector of the Supreme Court. The Secretary of the Treasury having had judicial experience, while the President's Justice thinks that one of the most difficult qualifications for the office of Collector is that he must be a lawyer.

It was nearly night, and as the tug reached a point about midway between Sandy Hook and the Highlands it was discovered that she had sprung a leak. All hands went to work to call her out, but their labors were vain. The water gushed up in them every minute, and it was not long before the furnaces were flooded and the fires extinguished. The condition of the men on board was now almost hopeless. In an vessel fast filling with water, in a high wind and from shore there seemed to be no opportunity of getting away or of calling for a steamer to give us shelter. For what was known as long as any steamer consisted in a small boat, was not strong enough to stand up to a gale, though it was not far from the coast.

The men on board the James Cook were evidently strong, and had held out for a long time.
